SHOWS THE NEED OF COMPULSORY ARBITRATION.

Unless some extraordinary power intervenes there will be a strike of some 600,000 coal miners next April. If the struggle should come it will mean an immense amount of suffering on the part of the families of the miners, the loss of millions of dollars by the operators and a general increase in the price of coal that will be felt by every section of the country.

It is undeniable that in such a conflict public sympathy will be in a general way with the miners. John Mitchell, the President of the United Mine Workers is one of the most level-headed labor leaders in the world, and his course in counseling his organization to accept a reduction of wages two years ago won the respect and confidence of the public. It seemed hardly possible, in the midst of such prosperity as the Republican politicians and been describing, that a great industry should be compelled to lower wages, but President Mitchell conceded that conditions made it necessary, and his influence prevailed with the miners.

He now insists that conditions have improved and that the operators can afford to restore wages to the former standard. From the reports of the employers did not deny the statements of Mitchell, but sought to divert attention to other points in the miners demands. Mitchell stated, however, that the crucial point was the matter of wages, and it will generally be believed that had the operators shown a disposition to restore the old wage scale an agreement could have been reached on the other points.

The situation again brings prominently before us the necessity of some form of compulsory arbitration that will not leave the public at the mercy of either side of an industrial controversy. Congress is about to enact a law providing for the regulation of the rates to be charged by transportation companies in order to prevent impositions upon the public. If there should be a great coal strike, however, the public would suffer more than from any probable overcharge by railroad companies. It seems strange therefore, that the authorized representatives of society should not have the right to step in and say that disputes between employers and employees should not be allowed to put the public to great inconvenience and loss.—Stockton Mail.

The Southern Pacific company has recently installed on its line a system of communication known as the telegraph, by means of which the conductors and brakemen on all trains may talk with the operator in a telegraph office along the line from any point on the road.
